Executive Summary of Business Program Accomplishments

Program Choice and Portfolio Organization

I chose the Bachelor of Arts in Business with a general concentration because I wanted to connect 22 years of Marine Corps leadership and personnel experience with the language and decision-making practices used in civilian organizations. Its breadth across management, economics, marketing, business law, analytics, and strategy supports my goal of advising executives and directors on people, performance, and strategy execution. It also complements my experience in nonprofit operations, college instruction, and business ownership.

My e-portfolio is organized to help an employer or potential client move quickly from an overview of who I am to evidence of what I can do. The opening section presents my professional profile and consulting vision. Resume and cover letter materials summarize my qualifications, followed by program learning summaries and academic artifacts such as papers, presentations, policies, and analytical exercises. Professional and leadership artifacts connect that coursework with military service, nonprofit operations, instruction, and entrepreneurship. Clear labels and brief descriptions let readers review the entire portfolio or move directly to the evidence most relevant to them.

Academic Accomplishments

My coursework strengthened several central program objectives: evaluating economic and market conditions, examining the internal and external business environment, using information and critical thinking to solve problems, and connecting marketing and operational decisions with organizational strategy. In BUSN100, Basics of Business, I created an Entrepreneur's Playbook for a proposed consulting firm and a two-factor authentication policy. The projects addressed organizational structure, competition, revenue options, technology, implementation, and employee communication. They taught me to connect recommendations with accountability and measures such as service quality, client retention, recurring revenue, and compliance.

PHIL110, Critical Thinking, improved my ability to evaluate claims and explain the reasoning behind a recommendation. A rhetorical analysis of a fictional advertisement helped me identify appeals to fear and unsupported authority, while a presentation on responsible artificial intelligence required a clear thesis, evidence, a counterargument, and safeguards. This work prepared me to question vendor promises, identify weak assumptions, and present balanced recommendations.

ECON201, Microeconomics for Business, connected specialization, scarcity, supply and demand, opportunity cost, and market barriers with practical decisions. Papers on construction workflows, nonprofit staffing, and housing affordability showed how limited labor, time, land, and capital affect results. I can use that perspective to assess workload, delays, capacity, and trade-offs before resources are committed.

BUSN250, Analytics I, strengthened my ability to organize spreadsheet data, create PivotTable summaries, and interpret descriptive statistics. An employee-training example helped me distinguish raw completion records from useful management information. Completion percentages, assessment scores, average training time, and unusual results can indicate whether training improves capability rather than merely records attendance. Together, these courses show my ability to turn theory into practical questions, measures, and recommendations.

Professional and Personal Impact

The BA in Business has met my professional goal of placing my leadership experience within a broader business framework and my personal goal of continuing to grow after a long military career. The program has made me more deliberate about evidence, measurable outcomes, limitations, and alignment with an organization's mission. As I pursue business and people consulting, the degree will strengthen my credibility while the portfolio shows how I think and work. Employers and clients will see a leader prepared to understand an organization, ask the right questions, and convert analysis into action.
